Five cultural dimensions - HOFSTEDE'S THEORY

- Power distance is the extent to which people accept unequal distributions of power. In a high power distance culture, the boss makes all the important decisions, and employees accept the total authority of their superiors. In a low power distance culture, decisions are made more collaboratively, and all employees expect some say in how things are done

Read the topic before the class starts and find any photos, diagrams or flowcharts that are related to that topic.

during class

Use the split-screen mode while attending classes. Have the note taking app on one side and the meeting on the other. This makes it easy for you to look at the meeting slides and type out the notes as well.

after class

After the class, go over the notes and format them in whichever way you like. Check for spelling and grammar mistakes. You can also add any other additional resources that your teacher has shared with you over mail.
